Hopelessness, hopelessness-related cognitions, and hopelessness-related coping across suicidal ideation, suicide attempt, and non-suicidal self-harm. Hopelessness plays a central role in the development and maintenance of suicidal ideation and behavior. However, recent research suggests that this relationship may not be straightforward as prior findings suggest hopelessness to be a risk factor for suicidal ideation and behavior. Further, whereas hopelessness has been conceptualized as a state, it is plausible that hopelessness-related cognitions and hopelessness-related coping may moderate the relationship between hopelessness and suicidal behavior. This study seeks to extend prior findings by using a dimensional approach to hopelessness and by testing whether hopelessness-related cognitions and hopelessness-related coping moderate the relationship between hopelessness and suicidal behavior. A total of 58 individuals with suicidal thoughts (ST, n=28), suicide attempts (SA, n=19), or non-suicidal self-injury (NSSI, n=7) completed questionnaires on hopelessness, hopelessness-related cognitions (cognitive fusion, negative automatic thoughts, and world illness), hopelessness-related coping (engagement, social support seeking, and positive reappraisal), and other relevant individual and family factors. They also completed the Beck Hopelessness Scale (BHS), a dimensional assessment of hopelessness. Hopelessness was elevated in the ST and SA groups. The effects of hopelessness on suicidal behavior was partly mediated by hopelessness-related cognitions and hopelessness-related coping. However, hopelessness was a uniquely significant predictor of suicidal behavior beyond hopelessness-related cognitions and hopelessness-related coping. We argue that self-blame, meaninglessness, and perceived social isolation are the important hopelessness-related cognitions and coping mechanisms that act as mechanisms to explain the relationship between hopelessness and suicidal
